Gene editing as the next gen plant breeding tool for breeders

Ahmedabad. The basis of plant breeding is the availability of trait variation and diversity in different crops, that can be brought together into a variety or hybrid with multiple superior qualities or characteristics. Plant breeders have been collecting wild variants of different crops for transferring better traits from wild to domesticated varieties. Random genetic variation historically has also been generated by treating seeds with various agents and selecting for plants with superior traits. These breeding methods were limited to plants that could be crossed with each other. However, genetic modification gave the breeders an opportunity to incorporate genes from different species into the plants, thereby increasing manifold, its available repertoire of genetic variation.

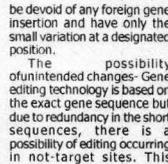

The latest addition to breeder's toolbox-gene editing, can enable changes similar to previously induced random changes (practiced by breeders in the past), generate variation similar to wild varieties as well as introduce genes in a plant, efficiently and in the most precise manner. The non-specificity and randomness in the previous processes led to a laborious, time-consuming and multi-generation selection process to select the plant with the required trait. Knowledge based and user friendly- The precision of the technology requires detailed prior information regarding the gene being modified and the variation being executed. Gene editing technology is being hailed as user friendly and easy to execute as its enabled by the enormous historical crop-wise data associating a gene to trait and the complete genetic sequence of multiple crops and varieties that has become available in recent years.

The intermediate GMO phase- The editing machinery and the target sequence can be inserted in the plant to carry out the change and later bred out or it can be provided transiently to affect the change. Therefore, the process of gene editing might have a GMO phase but the final variety or product would be devoid of any foreign gene insertion and have only the small variation at a designated position. The possibility of unintended changes- Gene editing technology is based on the exact gene sequence but due to redundancy in the short sequences, there is a possibility of editing occurring in not target sites. This possibility can be managed and reduced with better design of the components as well as using improved editing machinery. Researchers are continually working to improve the design and reduce any unintended changes. However, active weeding out of any edits that may have occurred in other traits as well as back crossing with the parent plant to breed out unintended changes if any, can take care of any such concerns.

Executive Director,

The technology has a lot of potential- Be it trees, plants with multiple or orphans, orphan crops or wild varieties, gene editing has the potential to solve multiple challenges quickly. The information and know-how from various plants can be applied to make crop plants climate resilient, low input requiring, pest resistant and sustainable for the environment. Devastating disease can be addressed using editing e.g. greening disease of oranges, Panama disease of banana, viral disease of tomato, nematode infections of soybean, fungal diseases of American chestnut and Elm trees, cacao fungal disease and pest etc. Crops can be improved to yield better with lesser fertilizer and water inputs and withstand extreme climate conditions. The first gene edited crops that are in the market are with improved consumer traits like better quality soybean oil and non-browning mushroom.

Executive Director,

Gene editing can open a whole new horizon for plant breeders, including many more food crops for cultivation and improvement, enabling multiple improvements in a short time and making plant breeding less time consuming and labour intensive. Gene editing will allow plant breeder to change the way crops are grown in fields as well as contained environments to harness their potential to the fullest. The technology itself is evolving towards improved precision and addressing current concerns. Gene editing will increase our pace for developing high yielding, stress resilient, sustainable and nutritive varieties in multiple crops in the next decade or so, positively impacting food security in a sustainable manner. Uttarakhand forest department to use GIS to check for encroachments Dehradun. To keep a check on encroachments on forest land, the Uttarakhand forest department has now asked all officials to use the Geographic Information System (GIS) technique to measure encroachments. Jai Raj, the head of forest force (HOFF), Uttarakhand forest department, issued the directions to all divisional forest officials in the state in a letter Wednesday. The letter read, "Encroachment on government land has been increasing continuously in the state, including forest land. It is important to vacate or remove encroachments from forest land with regular checking, but then, it is important to ensure that more land is not encroached upon. Instead of routine checks, encroachment must be checked effectively for which Geographic Information System (GIS) technique should compulsorily be used." The forest department has further asked all divisional forest officers to check satellite imagery of forest areas of the past years to check for changes in encroachment. The divisional forest officers have also been asked to employ stricter measures to check encroachment and not just erect boundary pillars.

In the last two surveys conducted by the Forest Survey of India over a period of four years from 2015 to 2019, Uttarakhand has not reported an increase of even 1% forest cover. In the latest report, Uttarakhand has reported its recorded forest area (RFA) as 38,00,00 sq km, which is 71.05% of its geographical area. The reserved, protected and unclassified forest cover comprises 69.86%, 25.01% and 4.13% of the recorded forest area in the state, respectively.
