US bitcoin as dirty as 6 m cars: Report

AVI ASHER-SCHAPIRO Los Angeles, September 23

THE CARBON FOOTPRINT of the US bitcoin industry is rising at breakneck speed, a report from environmental groups found on Friday, now rivaling the emissions of 6 million cars each year. The groups urged US states to consider bans on new mining operations to help protect the Emissions from the energy-hungry sector could undermine goals to tackle climate change, said Jeremy Fisher, an energy analyst with the non-profit Sierra Club and a coauthor of the report.

"We're at an inflection point," he said. "We're trying to rapidly decarbonize...Bitcoin mining has the potential to undo some of that progress."

The industry's carbon footprint, the groups said, was 27.4 million tonne from mid-2021 through 2022 - three times that of the largest US coal plant - or close to the annual emissions of 6 million cars, according to a calculator from the Environmental Protection Agency.

Bitcoin mining involves a network of energy-intensive computers that verify bitcoin transactions, and compete among themselves for new coins. Only 3.5% of global bitcoin mining was located in the United States in 2020 — now it's approaching 38%, according to a recent study from the White House.

The groups urged US states to consider blocking new mining operations. This year, the New York legislature passed a law to pause any new operations in the state that run on fossil fuel.

Bitcoin industry groups say the cryptocurrency sector is greener than other heavy industries and uses a relatively small amount of electricity - between 0.09% and 1.7% of total US power, according to the White House report. The Bitcoin Mining Council, which represents some major players in the sector, has released data showing that more than half the power used by its miners comes from renewable sources.

The council did not respond to a request for comment.

"Bitcoin is a technology with a lot of positive and negative climate potential," said Elliot David of Sustainable Bitcoin Protocol, a company that works with miners to promote clean energy usage.

"It's a question of perspective - if you are going to compare it to other industries, like cement for example, then it's relatively clean," he told the Thomson Reuters Foundation.

"But every industry needs to take part in addressing the climate crisis."

The report, co-authored by the environmental law non-profit Earthjustice, pulls from public documents, utility records, regulatory filings and financial disclosures, as well as press reports and testimony from activists across the United States.

Earlier in the year, a coalition of green groups launched a campaign to pressure Bitcoin into changing its software - known as "proof-of-work" - to a less energy-intensive method, known as "proof-of-stake".

"We've seen a relatively large increase in mining here in the US very quickly, since it was banned in China," said Mandy DeRoche, a lawyer with Earthjustice, which represents clients exploring how to challenge local mining operations.

"And we're concerned about the direction it's going."

In 2021, China severely restricted bitcoin mining, leading many firms to relocate or expand their U.S. presence.

Earlier in the year, Democrat lawmakers asked publicly traded bitcoin mining companies to reveal what energy they use.

Environmental groups say the industry's environmental record, energy usage and long-term impact on communities have largely been hidden from scrutiny.

Friday's report highlights cases where bitcoin miners have prolonged the life of fossil-fuel plants, pushed up electricity rates, strained power grids, and fallen short on promises to the local com-

Some miners say they benefit energy grids by providing stability and financing to renewable power generation.

In Texas, some miners have inked deals with renewable energy providers and signed up for flexible usage to smoothe

Others brand themselves as green; publicly traded CleanSpark says its energy is more than 96% carbon-free.

"It's not just that miners can be more efficient and use clean energy for their operations," said Zach Bradford, CEO of CleanSpark."But that bitcoin mining can actually hasten the low-carbon energy transition."

But in Kentucky, bitcoin mining has moved in the opposite direction, said Lane Boldman, executive director of the Kentucky Conservation Committee, an environmental group.

"A lot of these operations are going to be propping up bad or dirty energy projects - that's exactly what happened here," she said.

The report also examines what it says are the industry's unfounded environmental claims.

Those include a reliance on carbon credits or renewable energy "offsets" - tactics that the Sierra Club's Fisher said aim to hide the true impact of crypto mining on the climate.

"There's a lot of greenwashing going on," he said.

World Bank's president Malpass changes answer on climate crisis

WORLD BANK PRESIDENT David Malpass on Friday said none of the global development bank's shareholders have asked him to resign despite a wave of criticism this week after he declined to say whether he accepts the scientific consensus on global warming.

Malpass addressed the concerns on Thursday in an interview with CNN Inter*national* and in a separate note to staff, saying it was clear that human activity is fueling climate change and defending his record at the helm of the development

On Friday, he told Politico it was "unfortunate" that he responded as he did during an event on Tuesday: "When asked, 'Are you a climate denier?' I should have said no.... I really wasn't prepared and didn't do my best job in answering that charge."

Malpass, a Republican nominated by former President Donald Trump, said he was caught off guard by the question because "no one's said that other than (former Democratic Vice President) Al Gore, and it was pretty much off topic."

Malpass, whose five-year term is due to end in spring 2024, reiterated on Friday that he believed human activity caused climate change, while defending what he called the bank's "forceful leadership" on climate change and its role as the leading financier of climate change

Asked if any shareholder had asked him to resign over the issue, Malpass said,"No,

In fact, he said, shareholders had been strongly supportive of him and the work of the World Bank, citing "massive" support for its creation of a new pandemic response fund and the recent replenishment of the International Development Association facility for the world's poorest countries.
