

Titan's timekeeper bows out

SAMREEN AHMAD & DEBASIS MOHAPATRA
Bengaluru, 14 September

As he is set to hang up his boots this month end, Bhaskar Bhat, managing director at Titan, says it's the people in the company that he is going to miss the most.

For someone who spent nearly 36 years with Titan, associated with the firm even before the brand existed, Bhat was definitely a people's man.

Bhaskar Bhat,
MD of Titan

For the employees, he was a mentor without making it obvious and his soft signals and nudges led them to think and act in the right direction. No doubt, his schedule this month is packed with not just corporate meetings but engaging with employees all across the country who are bidding him farewell.

C K Venkataraman, the current CEO of the Titan jewellery business who is going to take over the reins from Bhat on October 1, describes him as a peoples' person. "He puts people at the centre of everything, believing in their full potential and looking only at their positive aspects," he says.

Bhat joined the Tata Watch Project in 1983, which went on to become the Titan Company we see today. Until 1982, the watches market was closed for private players, dominated by state-run HMT known as 'timekeeper to the nation'.

Titan started as an only-watches business with an investment of ₹100 crore, diversifying into jewellery in 1994 and later into eyewear in 2013, under Bhat's leadership.

Amphora hires Cecilia Oldne to oversee India business

London-based investment company Amphora has hired Cecilia Oldne, an investor in Sula wine firm, to oversee its business in India.

Sweden-based Oldne has been engaged with Indian wine company Sula since 2007, and also represents the Sweden-India Business Council in India.

"Amphora builds, manages and stores bespoke fine wine portfolios for collectors, investors and enthusiasts in London. They have investors from India who invest in fine wine which is stored in London for 20-30 and many more years. With my appointment, Amphora will have direct engagement in India. As MD of South East Asia, I have responsibility to manage business of Amphora in India," Oldne told PTI. The appointment took place during STHLM Tech Fest.
