Many mistakes make a Meesho

The online shopping app discovered its successful business model the hard way

ANJULI BHARGAVA
New Delhi, 7 July

There's only one aspect in his journey to date where he can safely claim he met or even exceeded his father's expectations. That was when he cleared the Joint Entrance Examination with a rank of 182 and made it into the Indian Institute of Technology Delhi (IIT Delhi). Almost all the other decisions that Meesho's founder Vidit Aatrey has taken in his 31 years would go against the very grain of his family and how they envisaged their son's future, ideally as an Indian Administrative Service (IAS) officer.

But IIT Delhi turned out to be an eye-opener for the young man who'd grown up in Delhi's Rohini, studying at a Sanatan Dharam trust school. He soon realised that few engineers from IIT actually become engineers: most join consultancy, finance and other "cool" tech companies that represent what may be loosely called the "new" economy.

Although Aatrey had long abandoned his parent's dreams of joining the IAS, he still chose something reasonably staid as his first job: a much coveted management traineeship with ITC at its Chennai packaging unit. But even as he settled into his work, he could see his batchmates and friends leaping ahead in assignments and companies where product launches, new discoveries and quick promotions were happening all the time, instilling in him a kind of fomo (fear of missing out).

So, when one of his seniors from IIT quit her job with InMobi and suggested that she refer him to fill in, he jumped at the chance, again to the dismay of his parents. Who gives up a steady job with a reliable name like ITC to join some unknown company somewhere?

Attached to the chief revenue officer, InMobi — which at the time was one of the few unicorns in India — gave him the chance to "learn everything about running a tech-enabled platform" and make it a success. Within a year, Aatrey was ready to launch his own InMobi-like start-up.

To fill in the tech expertise he

SHOP TALK

The lessons Meesho's founders learnt

- A hyperlocal model for fashion limited the selection for customers
- Customers care more about the variety than the pace of delivery
- Tools to facilitate shops selling on WhatsApp and Facebook didn't work because shop owners couldn't easily adapt to new tools and technology

- Replicating their business in Indonesia failed because they had spread themselves too thin
- Blindly aping others such as Amazon and Flipkart by charging a commission on sales doesn't work for small sellers needed, Aatrey got in touch with a former IIT batchmate who was working as a computer scientist with Sony in Japan, Sanjeev Barnwal, convinced him to quit his job to come and start a business with him. As the two brainstormed, they hit upon something he feels only those with their lower middle-class background and exposure could have.

Everyone around both of them had always bought everything from small shops and kirana stores. Yet there was no way to reach these stores online. You had to physically go to them to conduct business. This to them felt fundamentally flawed: 80-85 per cent of retail happened through these small stores, yet they had no online presence. That's when the seed of Meesho was sowed: literally short for "Meri Shop".

Although the two batchmates started in 2015, it was a while before they got even the basics right. Initially, they started what was like a Swiggy or Zomato for local fashion, a hyperlocal model which they soon saw didn't work. They realised that they were limiting the selection for customers by offering only localised products and that cus-

Although Vidit Aatrey (right) and Sanjeev Barnwal started in 2015, it was a while before they got even the basics right. Initially, they started what was like a Swiggy or Zomato for local fashion, a hyperlocal model which they soon saw didn't work tomers care more about the variety than the pace of delivery. Next, they decided to launch some tools to facilitate these shops selling on WhatsApp and Facebook but soon realised that this didn't work either as this means these shop owners have to adapt to using new tools and technology, which doesn't come to them easily.

That's when they found the core of what their business is today: Swatches of housewives and women selling lifestyle, beauty and fashion products through WhatsApp groups to their peers and relatives all over the country. Their focus shifted to native small online businesses, people who started their business on WhatsApp or Facebook.

Another mistake they made was in the early days when they decided to replicate their business in Indonesia three years ago on the assumption that all developing countries are similar and small-business heavy. They soon realised they had spread themselves too thin.

But perhaps the biggest learning has been not to blindly ape others. To begin with, Meesho decided to charge a commission on every sale on its platform, as is the practice followed by large e-commerce companies like Amazon and Flipkart, but this restricted the number of small sellers who work on wafer-thin margins. Few could afford to pay such commissions. This prevented many small sellers from coming onto their platform, so they did away with the commission.

Learning through a series of mistakes helped the company reach where it is today: 1,900 employees and with over ₹8,000 crore raised over several rounds of funding. The last round of funding was raised at a valuation of $4.9 billion in September 2021. It has half a million sellers on its platform and recently touched its 100 millionth customer.

Meesho is now "contribution margin positive" but since it is still investing aggressively to acquire new sellers and buyers on its platform, it is not profitable. The plan is to turn "cash flow positive" by the end of March 2023 and to stop burning money from then on. At some stage the company will go public to allow its present investors to exit.

Aatrey's journey is one his parents are now proud of because they can see the impact it is having. At half a million of the 60-million-odd small shops and sellers (MSMEs), Meesho still has a long way to go before it can say it has got anywhere with the problem it set out to solve. As with any route that has not been navigated before, the two founders face myriad challenges on a daily basis. But as the saying goes: A smooth sea never made a skilled sailor.

Pendencies in hate speech cases on the rise

Between 2017 and 2020, the number of cases filed under Section 153A pending trial in courts doubled; cases pending for 1-3 years saw a 147 per cent jump

ISHAAN GERA
New Delhi, 7 July

Last week, the government arrested Mohammed Zubair, co-founder of Alt News — a fact-checking portal — under Section 153A and Section 295 of the Indian Penal Code. Based on a complaint registered by an anonymous Twitter account, the police filed a case against Zubair for promoting enmity between groups (Section 153A) and offences relating to religion (Section 295).

This is not the first instance of police using Section 153A. An IndiaSpend analysis found that the filing of cases under Section 153A has increased 500 per cent between 2014 and 2020, as per data from the national crime records bureau (NCRB).

Further analysis by Business Standard shows that even though cases have increased, pendency at the stage of police investigations and courts has risen. In 2015, while police filed a chargesheet in 80.9 per cent of cases under Section 153A of the IPC, the pendency was 57.4 per cent. In 2020, NCRB data showed that chargesheet was filed in 72.6 per cent of the cases and pendency on the part of the police had increased to 64.3 per cent. Chargesheet filing had dipped in 2016 to 65.4 per cent, but it has risen back again.

Pendencies are even higher in cases filed before the courts. In 2015, 91.4 per cent of the cases filed under Section 153A were pending before courts. In 2020, as per NCRB data, 93.2 per cent cases were pending.

While conviction rates rose from 13.8 per cent in 2015 to 20.4 per cent in 2020, so have acquittals. In 2017, for instance, while 15 people were convicted

PENDENCY IN POLICE INVESTIGATIONS HAVE BEEN RISING

COURT-RELATED PENDENCIES ARE ALSO ON THE RISE

JUDICIAL DELAYS HAVE INCREASED

	2020	2017
Total cases pending trial	2,869	1,435
Pending for less than a year	815	485
Pending for 1-3 years	1,282	520
Pending for 3-5 years	542	330
Pending for 5-10 years	193	89
Pending for over 10 years	37	11

The NCRB data also illustrates the slow pace of the judicial process. Between 2017 and 2020, the number of cases filed under Section 153A pending trial in courts doubled from 1,435 to 2,869. The number of cases pending for less than a year increased 68 per cent during this period; there was a 147 per cent jump in cases pending for one to three years and a 117 per cent jump in cases pending for 5-10 years. According to NCRB data, the number of cases pending for over a decade increased nearly four times from 11 in 2017 to 37 in 2020.

Cases filed under Section 153A had one of the lowest conviction rates among other IPC crimes and some of the highest pendency rates.

10 years since the 'God Particle': What it revealed & why it matters

DEVANGSHU DATTA
New Delhi, 7 July

Higgs boson allows scientists to make better guesses about the universe's structure in the first 10 microseconds after the Big Bang

CERN FOR THE ATLAS AND CMS COLLABORATIONS, CC BY-SA 3.0/WIKIMEDIA COMMONS

In July 2012, the Large Hadron Collider (LHC) team at CERN, the pan-European Organisation for Nuclear Research, announced proof of the existence of the so-called Higgs boson. This elusive particle had been theorised back in the 1960s by Peter Higgs, and several other physicists, working independently in three different teams.

If it existed, it would explain why most fundamental particles had mass. Higgs & co suggested a mechanism, now known unoriginally as the Higgs Mechanism, where the particle worked with a field (the Brout-Englert-Higgs Field) to explain how it imparted mass.

Did it exist? The Standard Model of physics did not have answers to the "why and how" of mass. Yet, mass is an intrinsic quality — every atom, and most particles, have mass. Mass is constant for a given object and measures the inertia of the object. The more the mass, the more the force required to move it. Weight is a measure of the force of gravity acting on a given mass and differs for the same object on the Earth, Moon and Jupiter.

The Higgs boson could provide an explanation if it existed and the physicists concurred on the characteristics. They could estimate a range for its size and mass. It would have no electrical charge, no "colour" (quantum jargon for a property with nothing to do with colour as Van Gogh understood it), and no spin. They could estimate its life (how long it would last before decaying into other particles), etc.

Given the predicted values, the particle was hard to find. It "lived" for very, very short periods. Particles are discovered in high-energy experiments by banging them together at high velocities and analysing the data for deflections. But the Higgs' mass was outside the range of detection by existing particle accelerators. Hence Leon Lederman (Nobel winner for discovering classes of neutrinos) called it "That Goddamned Particle", and some prissy mediaperson turned that into the "God Particle".

The LHC is an enormously ambitious engineering project. It consists of a 27 km ring-tunnel deep beneath the Alps on the Swiss-French border near Geneva. It took 10 years to build and involved 10,000 scientists from hundreds of institutions. It quadrupled the energy used and has since upped the energy quotient even more.

One of the primary purposes was to seek the Higgs. A year into operation, the LHC found a particle that fitted the theoretical predictions. Higgs and Francois Englert (co-author of one of the other papers) were jointly awarded the Nobel for Physics in 2013. Sadly, the others were dead by then. So, 10 years down the line, what do we know about the Higgs and how did finding it change our understanding of the universe? Also, what does the LHC do now that the Higgs is nailed down?

The Standard Model offers the minimalist, least complex explanation of physical laws that fits much observed data. It involves just four fundamental forces and 12 particles. Its predictions can be verified through more experiments. The Higgs filled a gap with its explanation for mass. Knowing the exact characteristics of the Higgs allows scientists to make better guesses of the structure of the universe in the first 10 microseconds after the Big Bang.

The LHC will continue operating of course. It started running again on June 6 after an upgrade. It can now create beams with more density of particles, and higher energy. In the next decade, it will generate at least 50X the current data and may clarify many grey areas.

Scientists also say given the LHC experience, they can now design a particle collider, which will be far more precise in its measurements. This would cost a bomb, of course, and again it would have to be a multi-national, multi-institutional effort.

There are other holes in the Standard Model. It has no explanation for Dark Matter, or Dark Energy, although there's strong indirect evidence for both. Supersymmetry also involves some elegant but unproved hypotheses, which postulate more undiscovered particles out in the wild. The LHC and its successors could hunt those down if they exist.

A key scientific principle is that experiments can disprove hypotheses, but cannot definitively prove a theory. Newton's Laws of Motion explained much of the available data to decimal-point accuracy. But Einstein's Theory of Relativity was even more accurate and it explained things Newton's laws did not. More data out of the LHC and elsewhere could modify the Standard Model and update it for a more complete understanding.

Physics rarely inspires poetry except of the "There was a young lady named Bright/ Whose speed was far faster than light" variety. The 10th anniversary of the Higgs discovery inspired Amy Catanzano to compose "Higgs Boson: The Cosmic Glyph", a beautifully crafted piece which ends, "Coupling to the mass of a thing/ the Higgs Boson is the universe letting a poem sing."
