Transparency as antidote to conflict of interest

TRUTH BE TOLD
HARSH ROONGTA

Minesh, a client, had a couple of crores of rupees invested in financial assets like bonds, mutual funds, and shares. But around two-thirds of his investment kitty was invested in a residential flat whose value had grown manifold over a decade.

As Minesh was nearing retirement, he wanted to consolidate his investments. He wished to know whether he should sell the property and invest the proceeds in financial assets.

As I reviewed the facts shared by Minesh, it became clear that selling the flat made sense for a variety of reasons. One, Minesh would find it hard to manage the property after retirement as he was currently using his company's corporate resources to manage it. Two, the concentration risk from having two-thirds of the kitty in a single asset would be reduced. Three, investing the sales proceeds in a balanced fund would provide diversification without sacrificing consolidation and also allow a tax-friendly systematic withdrawal plan. Four, he had brought forward long-term capital loss from another transaction that he could set off against the substantial capital gains that would accrue on the sale of the property, reducing the capital gains tax outgo significantly.

However, there was a conflict of interest in rendering this advice. Our fee structure was based on percentage of assets under advice which did not include real estate assets. If Minesh sold real estate and invested the proceeds in a balanced fund, our fee would triple.

The investment advisory regulations that govern us require us to disclose such conflicts of interest to clients. My instinct said clients would be aware of such conflicts of interest but would value the advice when presented along with transparent disclosures.

But those were early days in our investment advisory practice, and I was worried that Minesh may disregard our advice because of the inherent conflict of interest. In any case, we had no choice but to follow the regulations. We disclosed the conflict of interest to Minesh and reiterated that we had tried to remain objective while providing the advice. We listed out the detailed reasoning behind the recommendation to sell the residential property. Minesh listened patiently, asked many questions, and finally decided to follow our recommendation.

Sometimes later, I asked Minesh about the impact that conflict of interest disclosure had on his decision making. He confirmed that the inherent conflict of interest was very much there on his mind. He found the presentation with the upfront disclosure of conflict of interest very transparent and professional. Far from dissuading him from acting on our recommendation, the transparent disclosure had spurred him to value the recommendation even more.

We have got similar responses from all clients in similar situations—whether it be advising clients to obtain an education loan rather than redeem earmarked mutual funds for the higher education of their children, or invest unexpected surplus in financial instruments rather than use them to prepay a loan.

Far from being a hindrance to our practice, transparent disclosure of conflict of interest is a powerful tool that has helped us build long-term trust with clients. These disclosure requirements, which are baked into the standards of the regulations, are also assisting the young but fast-growing investment advisory profession gain clients' trust.

Disclosure: I am the chairperson of the Association of Registered Investment Advisers (ARIA), a Section 8, not-for-profit company formed to promote investor interests by elevating the standards of the investment advisory profession. ARIA interacts with the regulator to seek direction and guidance and optimisation of the regulatory architecture of our profession to promote investor interests.

Harassed by loan recovery agent? Complain to banking ombudsman

If you perceive physical harm, get a magistrate to pass an injunction against the agency

SANJAY KUMAR SINGH

You would have read or heard about the incident in Hazaribag district of Jharkhand in which a 27-year-old pregnant woman, a farmer's daughter, was crushed to death under a tractor by a recovery agent. This happened as the agent tried to forcibly seize the vehicle on account of non-payment of dues.

With an estimated 1.5 million recovery agents belonging to around 75,000 agencies chasing borrowers across the country, incidents of harassment and intimidation are commonplace. "After Covid, once the moratorium was lifted, banks and non-banking financial companies (NBFCs) were under stress, and they turned to the recovery agents and agencies. The usage of non-qualified agents is another reason behind such incidents," says Nitin Purswani, chief executive officer and co-founder, Medius, an artificial intelligence-driven debt collection solution for lenders.

In this age when people borrow to meet a variety of needs, it is important to know how to respond to the intimidation tactics of recovery agents.

Typical malpractices

Loan recovery agents resort to a variety of tactics that have been declared illegal. One, they often call the borrower's parents, relatives, colleagues, neighbours, and sometimes even the employer, to use social stigma as a means of coercion," says Madan Srinivasan, co-founder, Creditas Solutions, a digital debt collection agency.

Two, they intimidate the borrower with calls and messages. They may use abusive language. Loan recovery agents also pay borrowers surprise visits at non-standard hours, such as early in the morning or late at night. At times, they even resort to physical violence.

Three, recovery agents at times impersonate others. If the borrower is not meeting them, they pretend to be calling from a court. They say that your case is underway, and if you don't show up you could go to jail.

"The whole purpose is to harass customers. There is a belief that such harassment and pressure tactics will lead to prioritisation. The borrower will find some means or the other to repay the loan," says Arun Ramamurthy, director, Andromeda sales and distribution, and an expert on digital lending.

Agents must adhere to code

Just because a borrower has defaulted doesn't give a recovery agent the right to misbehave with him. "Borrowers need to know their rights. Most borrowers, unfortunately, don't," says Purswani.

The Reserve Bank of India (RBI) has a comprehensive code of conduct for loan recovery agents. Any random agency or person can't undertake loan recovery. Only a person belonging to an empanelled collection agency, selected by the lender after due diligence, can undertake this task. The agency's name must be mentioned on the lender's website.

EXPLORE RESTRUCTURING OPTION

■ If you have defaulted on a loan, don't avoid the problem

■ Contact the lender, explain your reasons, and ask for the loan to be restructured

■ If the lender perceives a willingness to pay, it may be willing to restructure;

restructuring helps keep the lender's NPAs under control

■ Restructuring usually means increasing the loan tenure and reducing the EMI

■ It will offer you relief but will raise your overall interest cost

Recovery agents can't use abusive language. "The customer must be treated respectfully and be allowed to present his situation," says Ramamurthy.

Collection agents can only visit customers during standard hours. They can't even call customers at non-standard hours. If they are unable to contact the borrower, they can get in touch with his relatives only to request them to pass on a message.

How to deal with misconduct

A customer who faces harassment or misconduct should refuse to engage with the recovery agent. "Ask him to communicate in writing, or say you wish to speak to his supervisor. If wishes to write to you at your their communication with the borrower. This is in turn passed on to the borrower. If there is a false claim, the borrower can dispute it," says Purswani.

Legal recourse is also available

The customer can also take legal action. "If the defaulter has experienced intimidation, he can file a complaint against the bank and the recovery agency at a police station under Section 506 of the Indian Penal Code (IPC), 1860 (which deals with criminal intimidation). Provisions related to extortion under Section 384/385 of the IPC can also be invoked," says Bharat Chugh, former judge of the Advocate, Supreme Court of India.

If inappropriate language has been used by a recovery agent against a woman, an FIR can be lodged under Section 509 of the IPC.

If the police don't register an FIR or take any action, the complainant can approach a magistrate and lodge a complaint under Section 156 (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973. The magistrate can direct the local police to register an FIR against such recovery agents and investigate the matter.

A civil injunction suit can be filed against the bank and the recovery organisation asking for ad-interim relief. The court can issue an injunction against the recovery agency, which will ensure that it doesn't abuse or exceed its authority, and proceeds only in accordance with the law. "If the recovery agent enters a defaulter's home unlawfully, the latter can file a complaint at the local police station for criminal trespass. If he recovered money forcefully, a case of extortion can be filed against the agent," adds Chugh.
