Gregor Mendel's story shows why science should not be driven by ideology

July 20, 2022, marks the 200th birthday of Gregor Johann Mendel, a revolutionary scientist. He propounded that information on "traits" gets passed on from one generation to another as particulate "elements" and that traits in the present generation can be traced back to past generations. The notion was revolutionary because there was no theory about the mechanism of inheritance before Mendel. Mendel's theory, together with the evolutionary theory propounded by Charles Darwin, laid the foundations of biology. Mendel completed his schooling from the Gymnasium in Troppau. His physics teacher in the gymnasium, Friedrich Franz, who was impressed with his talents in physics and natural sciences, made a life-changing suggestion to him. Franz, a priest, informed Mendel that the Augustinian Order of the Catholic Church valued intellectual pursuits. He suggested that priesthood could offer Johann a path to learning and teaching. Johann grabbed the suggestion and joined St. Thomas monastery in Brünn (now Brno) in 1843 and changed his Christian name to Johann to Gregor. Cyril Napp (1792-1867) was the Abbott of St. Thomas, and was also interested in science, particularly plant cultivation and animal breeding. He built a glasshouse (greenhouse) for Gregor to pursue plant breeding. Abbots Napp had said that the questions to investigate are "what is inherited and how?" These questions motivated Mendel in his experiments. Between 1857 and 1864, Mendel undertook a series of plant breeding experiments in the monastery's garden, which were breathtaking for their brilliance in planning, observation and analysis, and also in the interpretation of the results. His experiments were designed with great thought to answer questions on offspring characteristics in relation to those of parents. He collected data on tens of thousands of pea plants over multiple generations and kept counts of characteristics and calculated ratios. He was searching for generalisable laws from the numerical data. And, he was immensely successful. Mendel represented a member of the nineteenth-century intellectual community who derived laws ("Mendel's Laws") from counts and ratios.

He presented a paper "Experiments in plant hybridisation" containing the results of his experiments to the Society for the Study of the Natural Sciences in Brünn in 1865. A scholar (Loren Eiseley) has written "stolidly the audience had listened. No one had ventured a question, not a single heartbeat had quickened. ... not a solitary soul had understood him." Mendel's paper was published in the proceedings of the meeting in 1866. However, there were only three citations of his work in the scientific literature during the next 35 years.

After 35 years of neglect, in 1900, three botanists -

Barodian's innovation sounds out the blind

VADODARA: Whenever he steps out of his house in Canada, Smit Patel never forgets to sport his spectacles. No, he is not wearing any style statement on the streets. But the spectacles guide him through the lanes and help him reach the destination in his town Victoria. The 24-year-old Barodian has been visually impaired since birth and the spectacles have given him the freedom that he once dreamt of - not being dependent on anyone for daily chores. "I have developed a software that will benefit the blind or partially visually impaired. This software can connect to the spectacles through the mobile phone and become a virtual guide for those having vision problems," explained Patel. A student of Navrachana Vidyan School, he shifted to Canada four years ago to pursue further studies. "The glasses that the visually impaired will wear would have tiny cameras, a microphone as well as Bluetooth. When the person wears the spectacles and connects it with the phone, it will start scanning everything around. If one puts some text in front of the glasses, it will read it too," Patel told. The user will have to just look in the direction he or she wants to go, and the spectacles will prepare a complete map of what lies ahead and around. "Once the users feed the location in the phone and wear the glasses, it will guide them through voice that will come out of tiny speakers fitted in the spectacles. Or, people can use a hands-free set too," Patel, who studies computer science at a college in Victoria, said. Patel came up with this idea knowing the troubles that visually impaired people face. They are either dependent on someone or even a guard dog in foreign countries. The spectacles will also read out sign boards and make video calls too.
