Are we really in the pandemic's endgame?

About 100 million people have been infected with Covid19 virus in just the last two months, the most during any equivalent period during the pandemic. And yet, there have been suggestions this might be the beginning of the end of the two-year-old pandemic.

Is this really the endgame?
 Is Omicron likely to be the last major variant of this coronavirus?
 Is it possible to predict how the virus would mutate in future?
 Or, do we need to reconcile ourselves to living with periodic, but regular, waves of infection in future?
 Is there anything we can do to prevent future waves?
 Or, are we helpless?

These, and many such, questions are the uppermost on the minds of everyone as India negotiates its third wave of infections. There are few people in the country who understand these questions better than Dr. Anurag Agrawal, director of Delhi-based Institute of Genomics and Integrative Biology, a CSIR research laboratory. As head of an institution that is currently involved in generating scientific information required to prepare response measures for the pandemic, Dr. Agrawal is one of the key voices in the government's decision-making apparatus.
