Google proposals 'in right direction': EU anti-trust chief

Europe's anti-trust chief Margrethe Vestager (pictured) said Google's proposals to comply with an Eu (European Union) order to modify its shopping service pointed in the "right direction". "It is less than a week since we got the letter so we have to go service pointed in the "right direction". "It is less than a week since we got the letter so we have to go a bit more in depth before we can say anything." Vestagers said just before we can say anything." Vestagers said just billion file over the issue. "But so far from the look of it... there are things that point in the very right direction, "she said. Google, which was given 90 days to comply or face further fines, submitted details of its offer to the EU last week, which Vestager said the teams were carefully evaluating. "We are in the process to see if they are sort of on the right track, but we do not approve it before they go ahead," Vestager said during an interview at her office at EU headquarters.

Now a smartwatch that tracks your every move

Scientists have created a new algorithm that enables smartwatches to not only record your exercise session but also detect when you are brushing your teeth or cooking, an advance that will provide a richer and more servi richer and more accurate richer and more accurate picture of your daily life. Current smartwatches can recognise a number of particular activities, including yoga and running, but these are programmed in advance. The new method, developed by researchers from the University of Sussex in the UK, enables the technology to discover activities as they happen, not just simply when exercising, but also when exercising, but also when brushing or cutting vegetables. Traditional models "cluster" together bursts of activity to estimate what a person has been doing, and for howlong, the researchers said.

Intel judgment critical for other EU antitrust cases

Wednesdaywhether US chipmaker Intel offered illegal chipmaker Intel offered illegal rebates to squeeze out rivas in a judgment that could affect EU antitust repulsors' cases against Qualcomm and Alphabet's Google. The ruling bythe Luxembourg—based Court of Justice of the European Union (EC) could also provide more clarity on whether rebates are anti-competitive by hasture or whether enforcers need to prove the antiprove the anticompetitive effect. The European Commission in a 2009 decision said that Intel tried to thwart rival Advanced Micro Devices by giving rebates to PC makers Dell, Hewlett Packard, NEC and Lenovo for buying most of their computer chips from the company. MIT's ComText lets robots follow voice commands cientists from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Massachusetts Institute of Technology of Indian origin, have developed a new system that allows robots to understand voice commands just like artificial intelligence (AI) assistants such as Siri and Alexa.

Currently, robots are very limited in what they can do. Their inability to understand the nuances of human language makes them mostly useless for more complicated requests.

For example, if you put a specific tool in a toolbox and ask a robot to "pick it up," it would be completely lost.

ask a robot to "pick it up," it would be completely lost. Picking it up means being able to see and identify objects, understand commands, recognise that the "it" in question is the tool you put down, go back in time to remember the moment when you put down thetool, and distinguish the tool you put down from other ones of similar shapes and sizes. Researchers from MIT have gotten closer to making this type of request easier.

They have developed an Alexa-like system called "ComText" — for "commands in context" — that allows robots to understand a wide range of commands that require contextual knowledge about objects and their environments.

"The main contribution is this idea that robust should have different kinds of memory, just like people," said Andrei Barbu, the project's co-lead. With CornText, Baxter was successful in executing the right command about 90 per cent of the time.

In the future, the team hopes to enable robots to understand more complicated information, such as multistep commands, the intent of actions, and using properties about objects to interact with them more naturally.

By creating much less constrained interactions, for a range of robotic systems, from self-driving cars to household helpers. "This work is a nice step towards building robots that can interact much more naturally with people," said Luke Zettlemoyer, an associate professor at the University of Washington in the US, who was not involved in the research. "In particular, it will help poots better understand the names that are used to identify objects in the world, and interpret instructions that use those names to better do what users ask," Zettlemoyer, said.

Indian-origin scientist creates medical camera to see through body

Until now, it has not been possible to track where an endoscope is located in the body in order to guide it to the right place without using X-rags or other expensive methods. Light from the endoscope can pass through the body, but it usually scatters or bounces off tissues and organs rather than travelling straight through. This makes it nearly impossible to get a clear picture of where the endoscope is.
